EDITOR'S NOTE

This issue of the Journal contains a wide variety of Articles and Notes that address an extensive array of trade-related issues.

Sally Meese and David Salem examine the interface of export controls and joint venture law between the Peoples' Republic of China and the United States; while at the same time, Najeeb Samie studies the British reaction to American antitrust laws; and William Dickey explores the causes of dumping margins.

This issue additionally contains the Journal's first examination of the effects of federal regulation on major seaports such as Baltimore, with Richard Lidinsky and Deborah Colson's first-hand account of the problems encountered in administering a seaport under the watchful eye of the federal regulatory scheme.

Student contributions from other law schools include those of Jane Stafford on Customs Court Reforms (American University), and Cyd Wolf's comment on the theft and trade of international art treasures. Our own Patricia Mathias has performed an in-depth analysis of the reduction in tax incentives for foreign investment in the United States real estate market.

Former Journal editor Robert C. Evans, who currently practices maritime law in New Orleans, is especially thanked for his continuing interest in the Journal and for the contribution of his book review.

Special thanks are also extended to former Articles Editor Virginia Skoglund for her work in soliciting articles, and Patricia Cox for her extensive editorial assistance.

The entire student editorial staff is commended for its perseverance and dedication to the Journal despite a major reorganization of the staff and the third change in office facilities in as many years.
